BOOK PROJECT

- Direct Democracy Rules: How Initiatives and Referendums Affect State Immigration Policy Contract at NYU Press, Completed Manuscript Submitted 12/2021

What explains the increasing role states are playing in state immigration legislation and what factors influence state immigration laws? The current scholarship argues that state immigration laws are affected by demographic, economic, and partisan changes. However, these investigations overlook how the variation in state legislative institutions and state interest groups affect the passage and content of subnational immigration laws. This book addresses these two larger puzzles (1) what affects the passage of state immigration laws over time and (2) What are the causal mechanisms linking state legislative institutions and state immigration policy? I argue that direct democracy mechanisms change the institutional strategies and goals of legislators as well as state interest groups. For example, I find that state legislators in states with direct democracy mechanisms pass more immigration legislation than legislators in states without these mechanisms. I take a disaggregated look at state immigration policies using qualitative and quantitative methods.
